About the Program:

The recent transition from faculty centric learning to student centric learning has paved a path for the institutions to self-assess and derive their own assessment methodologies for improving the quality of education which in-turn shall produce quality students for the betterment of the society. The universities and the engineering institutions have to follow certain guidelines specified by AICTE as well as discipline-specific accrediting bodies like ACM, IEEE, CSAB, and others, to design curriculum. In addition, department recognizes the need for accountability to all of its stakeholders: students, faculty, staff, administration, parents, alumni, employers. Assessment data provides evidence to all of these groups that department is scrupulously monitoring its progress towards its goals.

Assessment is a teaching and management tool, designed to provide departments and units with quality information on which to improve learning and base organizational decisions. It is a process of defining a program or unit's mission, developing desired outcomes, continuously monitoring progress towards those outcomes, communicating results, and using those results to make improvements.

Assessment is founded on a set of overall institutional outcomes, drawn from the institution's mission. Program level learning outcomes are developed from these outcomes; course level learning outcomes are developed from program outcomes; and lesson level outcomes arise from the outcomes of the course. All are designed to achieve the institute's set outcomes.

The results of outcomes assessment from courses and programs provide empirical data for departments to develop their own annual and long-range plans. At the institutional level, this information, as well as information from assessment of institutional outcomes, is analyzed and coordinated within the scope of the institution's mission and its projected resources and priorities to develop its recommendations for resource allocation and longrange planning.
